

Chapter 10

DISCOVERIES

The inquiry weren't finished.

Mr Crawford and the policemen controlled the current account of the killer.

“How I imagined”, thought Mr Crawford.

In the current account there were strange credits, which included high amounts of dollars. This meant that the crazy wasn't the only guilty: and this was the proof. Now the question was: who was/were the other/s guilty/ies?

The second inquiry to make was going at the notary's to dicover Mr Jones's testament.

Mr Crawford was ready to read the documents: by now he understood from the interrogatories who were the destinataries of Mr Jones's estate. But when he finished to read the testament, he gaped. He read again, with more attention, but he didn't read badly.

But why? Why so? He wasn't logical... save if...

The police commissioner understood.

The case was finished.
