

Chapter 2

THE CADAVER

Tomorrow, the police was in the place of the crime.

The blood encrusted the wrought iron gate and stained the pavement of a dark red.

The body was laid out on the ground.

The reason of the death were been the stab wounds damaged by a penknife.

Mr Jones wasn't dead on impact, but his death was been short anyway.

The marks of blood on the gate left suppose that, like the last way of safety, he would cried to try to draw the attention of someone and tried to enter.

The scientific police had already isolated the place of the murder and marked the cutout of the cadaver.

The overture of taking the small samples of every supposed clue which could have connected at the murder was on the point of finish.

While was happened all this, the chief of police, Crawford, tried to reconstructed the event.
